I drive up and down the east coast quite frequently, several times a year. I average 3000 miles a month, and recently purchased a new vehicle with XM radio. In traveling to Rhode Island and Massachusetts this past weekend, I was able to find traffic info throughout my trip at any time I wanted, even when driving well past midnight just by tuning in on my XM band. Trying to accomplish this with FM or AM, even if you can find a station broadcasting with an RDS tag is almost impossible, especially late at night.

If I'm paying money for the service, you have no right to limit what they can or cannot offer. If the NAB is too shortsighted to realize that XM (and satellite radio in general) is the wave of the future, they are only hurting themselves.

My money, my radio, leave it alone.
